

SAN FRANCISCO PEAKS FLAGSTAFF'S LANDMARK

Travelers, crossing the continent by the Santa Fe Railway, come into view of the San Francisco Peaks in Arizona, the forenoon of the third day from Chicago, and continue with them in neighborly company, for some hours. From the observation car, after passing Williams, these peaks may be seen until the train crosses a range west of Ash Fork. Returning from the Coast, the scene comes into view in reverse order.

These peaks rise 13,610 feet above the level of the sea, some miles northwesterly of Flagstaff. The distance to the base of the peaks is a fair half-day's journey, and to their summits a full day or more; but the atmosphere in these altitudes is so rare that it seems to be no more than an hour's ride. So the distance seemingly shortened, they are neighbors of Flagstaff, the nearest important railway station, and are a landmark of the region roundabout.

They rise within the great Coconino Forest Reserve, and upon their summits the United States Government has established a temporary lookout station, which, probably, will be made permanent. Fire lookout stations are numerous in forest reserves; their purpose, as may be implied, to lookout for fires in the timber, and, by an established system of signals, to inform rangers employed by the Government, that they may hasten to the scene. Since June 17, Frank G. Lewis, a fire lookout, has been stationed on these peaks. He has a camp about 1,000 feet below the summit, where he sleeps, spending all the hours of daylight on top, keeping sharp lookout for smoke. Triangulating on the smoke he locates the fire, and, by signals, warns rangers many miles distant.

From his station, Lewis sees sections of the six states of Arizona, California, Nevada, Utah, Colorado, New Mexico. Eastward, he sees the Buckskin Mountains north of the Grand Canyon of Arizona, and the north wall of the canyon between. He sees Mount Thomas and Escudilla Mount in the White Mountains, which rise in Apache county, Arizona. Southward he sees the smoke rising from the Clarkdale smelter, in Verde Valley. Northward, peak after peak rise, until the scene falls below the horizon.—The Earth.
